Preface

In the shadows of our world, where darkness dances with the unknown, lies the realm of the inexplicable, the eerie, and the spine-chilling. It is in this twilight realm that the tale you are about to delve into unfolds—a story that will awaken your deepest fears and send shivers racing down your spine.

Within these pages, you will encounter a character whose descent into darkness is as unnerving as it is captivating. An Ice Cream Man, once a symbol of childhood delight, now stands at the crossroads of sanity and malevolence. What drove him to forsake the sweetness of innocence for the bitter taste of evil? The answers lie ahead, waiting to ensnare your imagination.

The road ahead will be treacherous, and the path obscured by the fog of the unknown. But fear not, dear reader, for as you turn each page, you are not alone. The characters who inhabit this tale, both heroes and villains, will guide you through the labyrinthine twists of their world, and together we will face the terrors that lurk in the darkness.

Horror, at its heart, is a genre that explores the limits of our fears and the depths of our psyche. It is a mirror that reflects the primal instincts we so often bury deep within ourselves. As you embark on this chilling journey, I invite you to confront your own fears, to peer into the abyss, and to question the nature of good and evil.

But remember, dear reader, the thrill of a good horror story lies not only in the fear it invokes but in the catharsis it provides. It is a journey of suspense, mystery, and ultimately, self-discovery.

So, hold tight to your courage, for the Evil Ice Cream Man awaits, and the shadows beckon. Your heart may race, your palms may grow clammy, but fear not—within these pages, you are safe.

With bated breath and a racing heart,

The Story of Rod Sullivan

Our story begins in the early 20th century. Sister Madeline, along with her family, was living in a country house in Poland when tragedy struck during the September Campaign of the Joint Military Occupation by Nazi Germany and the Slovak Republic on the Republic of Poland. During a bombing, her entire family and her beloved daughter Elisa died. She was heavily injured, but by God's grace, she made it out from the injury. She then suffered emotionally from the loss of her beloved daughter. To escape the war, she went to the USA on the 19th of September 1939. Just 17 days after her escape, Poland was annexed on the 6th of October 1939 by Nazi Germany and the Slovak Republic.

In the USA, Madeline applied to become a nun at a Christian missionary school. She secured a position at Eagle Jr. High School in Washington, D.C., where she served as a nun while teaching about the teachings in the Bible. However, she couldn't forget her daughter Elisa, whom she loved more than anyone. Desperate to reunite with her daughter, Sister Madeline delved into unconventional methods, exploring ways to bring Elisa back to life.

She attempts some unusual experiments to bring Elisa back to life, using mischievous children as test subjects.

This period of experimentation culminates in the summoning of Nazrat, a powerful being who is neither an angel nor a devil. Nazrat grants Sister Madeline's wish to bring Elisa back. In December 1940, Sister Madeline gives birth to a new baby with Elisa's soul. To her surprise, the baby is a boy, as she had wished for Elisa without realizing that Elisa's soul was within this child. She orders a new pink room to be prepared for him, takes care of the baby for four years, and then sends him to be cared for by his stepfather, Joseph Sullivan, in 1944. Joseph, now a popular ice cream maker in town, always forbids Rod from trying his delicious ice creams without explanation. One day, Rod manages to find the key to the locked fridge and tastes one of the ice creams without permission. This leads to Rod gaining alarming weight in a short period and being bullied in school, making him feel isolated. Joseph scolds him, but also provides comfort as a counsellor in a culinary school in Berlin, Germany. Despite this, Joseph continues to increase his fortune and breaks the Guinness World Record for the Largest Ice Cream Cone. However, back at the Convent School, when Sister Madeline learns about this, she, now a worshiper of Nazrat, wishes for Nazrat to kill Joseph, and her wish is granted.

Joseph Sullivan

Local Cemetery where Joseph is buried

One day in 31st December 1955, as Joseph headed to the office, tragedy struck as planned by Nazrat. A car ran over Joseph Sullivan, ending his life. Young Rod was deeply affected when he learned about this unfortunate accident. The neighbours arranged a funeral for Joseph Sullivan, and he was laid to rest at a local cemetery in December 1st January 1960.

Meanwhile, at Eagle Jr. High School, Sister Madeline, now an evil nun worshipping Nazrat, orchestrated a horrifying series of events. She killed many of the nuns and sent all the children to a mysterious place unknown to anyone. Those who tried to escape either succeeded or faced brutal beatings or even death at the hands of Sister Madeline and her hammer. The successfully escaped children remained silent about the atrocities, haunted by the fear of the devil-worshipping nun for the rest of their lives. Unfortunately, many of them succumbed to mental disorders, extreme illness, or the severe physical trauma they endured. However, some managed to survive the harrowing experience. They didn't utter a word about the things happened to them in the school because of fear.

Joseph Sullivan's Grave

After the day of Joseph's funeral ceremony, Rod began receiving letters from his mother, Sister Madeline, sent from the school, wishing him a happy birthday and requesting him to meet her there. Initially, Rod was angered by the fact that his mother had not attended the funeral, but later he chose to ignore the letters. Sister Philippa continued to send these letters to Rod on his birthday every year until his 25th birthday in December 1965. On that occasion, the letter came with a special book containing the full recipe of the secret ingredient that made those ice creams immensely popular and addictive.

Sister Madeline harboured a strong dislike for Joseph, to the extent that she played a significant role in orchestrating his car accident. However, Joseph held a different sentiment towards Sister Madeline. He was grateful to her for allowing him to raise Rod. As a gesture of thanks, Joseph sent Sister Madeline the secret recipe in a letter, which was mailed in 1945 to Eagle Jr. High School. Sister Madeline cherished the letter as a gift from Joseph for two years. She transcribed the recipe into a book, which she kept until Joseph's passing in 1955.

When Rod learned about the recipe, he began making and experimenting with it to enhance the flavour. On September 27th, 1972, he finally perfected the recipe, marking the beginning of his reign of success and popularity.

During his school years, he swore revenge on his classmates that he would murder them all.

He either killed or was implicated in the deaths of his peers. The last victim was a security guard who was kidnapped and never seen again. Many posters were put up by his mother until she passed away and was laid to rest at the same cemetery where Joseph had been buried.

After exacting revenge on most of his classmates that he could find, Rod took on various jobs at different places. He worked at a cafeteria and served as a janitor in a local cinema. Lacking a car and the funds to afford an ice cream van service, he relied on the metro to commute to his workplace at the café or cinema. During his shifts at the café, he often found himself daydreaming about the time when his father narrated the story of his journey to becoming a successful ice cream maker: 'Joseph was born in poverty, and being of German-

American descent, he never attended school in Germany. As his dad was American and the teachers were Germans, he feared potential bullying or harm. To avoid such situations, he decided to make ice cream and sell it to the students attending the school in front of his small house.

In return, he would borrow books to study for 3 or 5 days and then return them to the students. The students, appreciative of his efforts, began donating money to him. He used some of the money to sustain himself, as his parents had been killed in World War 1, and invested the rest in learning how to make ice creams. Later, he secured a job as a janitor at a local cinema. On occasions, he would discreetly let the students who had supported him into the cinema for free.

After accumulating enough funds, he enrolled in a culinary school in Germany, eventually becoming the head chef of his team in the ice cream class. Following the attainment of his bachelor's degree in Culinary Arts, he opened an ice cream shop in Germany, offering free ice creams to those who had supported him. These individuals, now grown men, became investors in his company. However, when World War 2 broke out and his friends were conscripted into the military, fearing the war, he fled to the USA and reopened his shop. In the next moment, Rod is using the metro to travel to his house.

Chapter 2

Beginning of Rod's New Life

Rod Sullivan resided in a neighbourhood in a small town in Washington DC for several years. During this time, he aspired to revive his father's ice cream factory. Unlike his father, Rod harboured a disdain for workers and employees, but in contrast, he possessed business acumen and engineering skills. He took on the task of enhancing his father's mechanical robot, which aimed to replace employees with robots, enabling more efficient work at minimal or no cost.

Rod's Neighbourhood

Rod reopened his father's factory on April 1, 1974. However, he faced a significant challenge—there were no available workers, and no one was interested in working in an ice cream factory. After some contemplation, Rod devised a solution: he decided to produce the ice cream in his own home until he could hire staff. The first ice cream he sold from his father's original ice cream shop was a tremendous success. Rod's revamped ice cream recipes quickly gained popularity among the locals and soon expanded to other states. Money started pouring into his pockets.

Joseph's Prototype Mini Robo

While enjoying success with his ice cream venture, Rod faced difficulty finding willing workers to meet the growing demand. Frustrated, he temporarily closed the ice cream company for five months. During this hiatus, he dedicated himself to improving his father's robot models. Eventually, he succeeded in creating the first prototype, which he named "Mini Robo." The factory remained inactive for an additional two years, during which Rod continued making ice cream in his home and selling it from his van around town.

Rod's Improved Version

During these two years, Rod developed six unique robots for various tasks such as cleaning, cooking, and managing. He also recreated his father's initial prototype. The factory was reopened on May 2, 1976. With the implementation of his robotic workforce, Rod no longer required human employees, and the ice cream factory was now producing 4,500 ice cream crates per hour. His ice creams gained popularity nationwide, being sold in all 50 states of America. The success of his business extended internationally, reaching Europe and even Oceania. The first international store was opened in Berlin, Germany, where Rod's father had grown up.

Despite the global expansion, Rod maintained the character of his company as a luxury brand, refusing to compromise on quality, he once said in an interview that “I will always put Quality before Quantity in my products”. His ice creams were considered luxury goods internationally, consistently receiving positive reviews. Rod renamed his father's company from “Frosty” to "The Sullivan’s Ice Cream" and adopted the motto, "The recipe for happiness is within everyone’s reach” but never changed the logo of the first factory, his father made, it remained as “Frosty Ice Cream”. The success was unprecedented; he transformed his factory from a conventional ice cream manufacturing plant into a creatively designed recreational space. Here, visitors could play games, read comics, create their own ice creams, and purchase the company's merchandise. In addition, Rod established a museum on the second floor to honour his father's great success and showcase the history of the company. Rod's dream was materializing. At present, he presented himself as a strategic, humble, and genuinely amiable individual engaged in the business of selling ice creams. Few could fathom that this man, seemingly at peace, had a dark past—having once committed heinous acts, including the murder of many of his classmates. However, lurking beneath the surface was a smouldering resentment, waiting for just the right catalyst to rekindle his animosity towards children. Unfortunately, that spark was not far from ignition.

Chapter 3

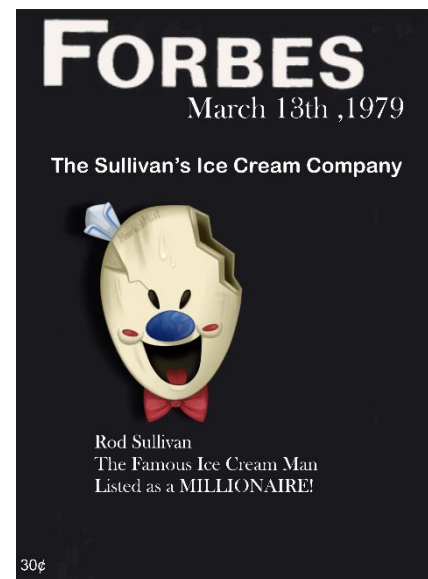

Beginning of Rod's Terror

One day, Rod was preparing to head to his factory, situated in the familiar neighbourhood he had never abandoned despite having the means to acquire a new mansion. Despite his considerable wealth, Rod had adopted a down-to-earth persona. He invested in numerous companies and directed the majority of his funds toward improving the conditions in his factories. Remarkably, he refrained from altering anything in his father's inaugural ice cream factory, maintaining its original character.

Having amassed unimaginable wealth, Rod earned a spot on the 1979 Forbes list as a millionaire. However, the smooth trajectory of his life took a sudden turn on the 23rd day of November 1980. A complaint surfaced against Rod Sullivan, filed by one of the individuals he was alleged to have murdered. The Washington, D.C. police swiftly became aware of the scandals and murders that had transpired over the past decade, prompting them to obtain a warrant to investigate Rod's factory.

Informed by a friend, Rod promptly alerted his international factories to cease operations, closing down every factory, store, and office worldwide. He hastily booked a flight to Switzerland. Meanwhile, the Washington, DC Police had initiated a raid on his original factory. They shattered numerous glass cases containing Joseph's awards and confiscated several awards and books for investigation. The probe extended over three months, culminating in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia ordering the investigation's termination and closing the case.

While in Switzerland, Rod caught wind of these developments through television news. He returned to Washington DC six months after the case had been closed, only to discover that his house had been sold to others. Upon revisiting his factory, he was met with devastation – his father's awards, the ceilings, and the walls had either been destroyed or damaged. Fuming with anger, Rod found himself powerless.

Unable to reclaim his lost possessions, he sat on a bench outside the factory, reflecting on the choices that had led to this nadir in his life. His frustration grew, leading him to formulate a plan to unleash his anger on those he despised the most—overweight children. Having suffered bullying during his school years due to weight gain, he vowed revenge. Clad in the same mask his father once wore, Rod planned to travel through neighbourhoods, enticing fat children with his ice cream and kidnapping them. Thus, the reign of Rod's terror began.

One night, Rod prepared himself for revenge by donning the uniform of an ice cream seller. He got into his van and navigated the familiar streets of his old neighbourhood, driven by the need to gather information. His objective was clear: to ascertain where the children resided, their routines, and identify the new occupants of his former residence.

Over the course of five days, Rod meticulously carried out his inspection, observing the comings and goings of the neighbourhood. He wanted to understand the dynamics, familiarize himself with the routine of the children, and uncover the identity of those now residing in his once cherished home. With a focused determination, Rod successfully pieced together the puzzle, gaining a comprehensive understanding of the details he sought.

During his investigation, Rod discovered that the new occupants of his former residence were none other than his old classmate, Daniel Brown—the same person who had once mocked him relentlessly. Fuelled by rage, Rod harboured a desire to exact revenge on Daniel, just as he had with others. However, a newfound awareness stopped him in his tracks.

Rod realized that Daniel Brown had connections with the chief of the Washington DC Police Department, making a direct confrontation perilous. Fearful of potential legal consequences, Rod opted for a different approach. He devised a plan to kidnap Daniel's son, J. Brown, as a means to exert control.

As Rod contemplated his strategy, he observed J. Brown peering out of his window. seizing the opportunity, Rod decided to leave the neighbourhood after three minutes, ensuring he remained undetected. While on his way to his former workplace, Rod pondered the fact that J. Brown wasn't overweight, making him an unsuitable target for his revenge.

Recalling another fat kid named Charlie Owens, who happened to be good friends with J. Brown and frequently visited his house around 4:30 PM, Rod formulated a new plan. He decided to approach the house on the Christmas Eve of 1982 at 4:40 PM, minimizing suspicion, and intended to entice Charlie with the offer of ice cream. His ultimate goal was to discreetly kidnap Charlie Owens, starting his revenge plan with careful precision. So, it was final.

On the 25th of December, Rod drove to the neighbourhood, arriving slightly behind schedule at 4:45 PM. Nonetheless, it proved opportune as J's house was his destination. Initiating his plan, Rod played the familiar melody Joseph had used to attract customers to his ice cream. Charlie, on the second floor of J's house, overheard the tune and decided to investigate, announcing to J that the ice cream man had arrived.

Excited, Charlie ventured outside to purchase some ice cream. While J patiently waited, curiosity prompted him to check outside from the window. To his horror, he witnessed Rod, adorned in his chilling mask, froze Charlie at the scene and depositing him into the trunk of his van. Reacting swiftly, J sprinted as fast as his legs could carry him. With his parents absent at the time, he ventured outside, but his efforts proved futile. Rod had executed his plan flawlessly, abducting Charlie and transporting him to his sinister workstation.

Everything unfolded according to Rod's scheme, except for one critical detail—J had witnessed the entire abduction. Rod sped away to his hideout, leaving J to lock up his house and retrieve his bicycle. In an attempt to trail Rod, J pedalled in the direction he had gone. However, the pursuit proved challenging, and unable to trace the path completely, J eventually returned home, haunted by the traumatic sight he had just witnessed. Determined to aid his friend Charlie, and with his parents unavailable, J felt the need to take matters into his own hands. Lacking sufficient information to contact the police, he rummaged through his drawers and discovered a rough map of his district. Recognizing the gravity of the situation and fuelled by their longstanding friendship, J committed to rescuing Charlie, spending the rest of the day devising a plan for the following morning.

Map of J's District

As dawn broke, J woke up, donned his attire, and retrieved his bicycle from the garage. He pedalled to the local cafeteria, intending to gather information from the workers. Inquiring about the mysterious ice cream seller, he learned that the employees were unfamiliar with the ice cream seller until J mentioned his name Rod. An employee told him that Rod S. was a former cashier here at this cafeteria, Rod had worked there for a few years. J expressed gratitude to the employee for the crucial information and exited the establishment.

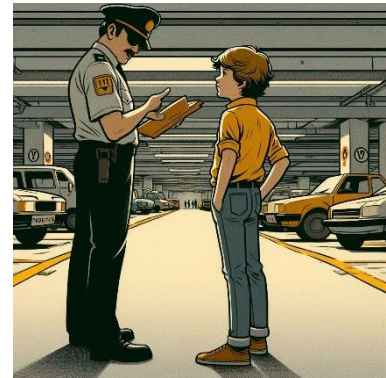

With this newfound knowledge, J decided to explore the old abandoned park, which had been under renovation before workers went on strike, leaving the project incomplete. J's instincts led him to believe that this unfinished park might be connected to Rod's sinister plans, and he embarked on the next phase of his mission to unravel the mystery and rescue his kidnapped friend. Under the cover of night, J ventured to the abandoned park, cautiously exploring the area in search of clues. The silence of the deserted surroundings was abruptly shattered by the haunting melody he recognized from the first time Rod had entered his neighbourhood. Without a moment's hesitation, J sprinted to the nearest hiding spot—a telephone booth. He swiftly locked himself inside and crouched down, ensuring Rod couldn't spot him through the booth's window. Anxiety gripped him, his heart pounding faster than usual.

As the familiar tune drew nearer, J's fear intensified. Rod approached the telephone booth, and for a fleeting moment, J feared he had been noticed entering the booth. His heart raced, breaths held, as Rod reached the telephone. However, to J's immense relief, Rod continued past the booth, eventually settling in a chair near the telephone booth, oblivious to J's presence. The darkness concealed J, allowing him to breathe a sigh of relief. Peering cautiously from the window of the telephone booth, J observed Rod sound asleep on the chair, since his hammock in his workstation had become dirty. Seizing this opportune moment, J decided to make his move.

Silently unlocking the booth, he stepped out with utmost care, ensuring not to make any noise that could alert Rod. Slowly, he navigated his way out of the park, careful to maintain his stealth. Once safely beyond the confines of the park, J mounted his bicycle and pedalled away from the scene, determined to return home and formulate the next phase of his plan to rescue his friend Charlie from Rod's clutches.

The following morning, J received a call from his parents, notifying him of their impending arrival in the next week. Faced with this time constraint, J felt the urgency to act swiftly. On the next morning, he decided to investigate a nearby parking lot that Rod used to frequent before reopening his factory.

Entering the parking lot, J approached a security guard and inquired about an ice cream selling van. The guard, puzzled, gestured toward a directory of individuals using the parking facility. Despite J's thorough search, there was no trace of Rod or his van. Undeterred, J pressed on, specifically asking about the owner of the van, identifying him as an ice cream seller named Rod.

To J's frustration, the guard admitted that there was no entry for someone named "Rod" in the directory, leaving him with a dead end in his quest to locate Rod's van. The urgency of the situation compelled J to think quickly and devise alternative strategies to rescue Charlie before his parents returned.

Frustrated and feeling a sense of hopelessness, J decided to leave the parking facility. However, a moment of clarity struck him, and he pulled out the map he and his friend had created. A single location remained unexplored—an abandoned storage unit situated far from his current position. Despite the considerable distance, J felt compelled to investigate. After nearly two hours of travel, he reached the location and decided to rest momentarily.

Suddenly, the familiar tune echoed in the air, accompanied by the distinct sound of a van approaching. J, quick on his feet, hid behind a nearby bush. Witnessing Rod driving into the storage unit, J deduced that this must be Rod's secretive haven. As Rod entered the unit and its doors closed, J took decisive action.

He climbed a not-so-tall wall and entered the unit. The space was modest, with a small box outside and a hammock tied between two trees. Spotting two fridges inside, J opened one, only to discover Charlie frozen within. Determined to free his friend without making noise, he noticed some pills nearby. J mixed them with a bottle of water situated by the hammock and patiently awaited Rod's awakening.

After three hours, a somewhat worried J witnessed Rod finally waking up and drinking the water infused with the mysterious pills. To J's relief, Rod succumbed to unconsciousness. Seizing the opportunity, J shattered the ice block encasing Charlie with a sledgehammer found inside the unit.

With Charlie liberated, J instructed him to take a bicycle positioned near the front doors, which J opened from the inside. Both boys swiftly rode to their respective homes, escaping the clutches of Rod's malevolence.
